

When You Can't Go Out Go In

Gail Bingham Kohanek

The pandemic arrived shortly after it also was becoming harder to leave my husband home alone, given his increasing confusion with Alzheimer's disease. I confess to too many dark hours and days, lost in wondering what to do, feeling more than a bit sorry for myself, and embarrassed knowing that I am very much one of the privileged ones!

It took a while, but the old photos in my computer eventually revealed themselves as a treasure box to open and play with once my complaints that I couldn't go on the photo journeys I loved got loud enough for me to hear. I learned how to create new landscapes of the imagination through which I could journey within, into the magical and the unknown, which the pandemic only reminds us is the truth anyway.
